The film was directed by John Schlesinger and starred John Houseman, Michael Moriarty, and Robert Webber. The film was nominated for four Academy Awards, including Best Actor for Houseman and Best Supporting Actor for Moriarty. Plot James Hart has just started law school at Harvard Law School, and his first day of class is underway. He has been asked to stay in the classroom to hand out copies of his personal background questionnaire, in order to assess the law students' needs. As James meets and talks to students, he notices that the only "A" student in the class is a man in the back of the room, whose questions show he has completed the questionnaire in a hurried, sloppy fashion. James notices that the only other student with an "A" is the only black student in the class. After the professor assigns papers for the upcoming term, James finds out that he will be writing a paper on liability. He meets the paper's co-author and discovers that it is being written by a man named Ingersoll, who is researching law in an academic setting and who is doing research on the negative effects of legal liability. James tells him about the questionnaire and they agree to discuss the matter further when they meet in two weeks at a museum Ingersoll wants to visit. At the museum, James meets lawyer Lacey Davenport, who is a year ahead of him at Harvard Law, and professor James B. Maguire. Maguire tells James that Ingersoll, whose career he is investigating, is having difficulty finding appropriate people to collaborate with on his project, and Maguire takes James as a candidate. Maguire tells James that he expects to be sent to prison for accepting money from two companies with which he has worked in the past, and so he has told Ingersoll that he will only take the money if the project will not lead to a trial. Ingersoll, who has been unable to find anyone to help him, is skeptical of Maguire's claim. James goes to see a woman named Ann Lovett, who owns a company that does research and development in chemical substances, where he learns that her company is being sued by a product that has been associated with brain damage. To defend his company, she has been hired to find out how she can induce people to sue the chemical company in question, as this is the only way to reveal the truth of the matter. 82157476af
